

PROCRASTINATION IS JUST ANOTHER HABIT

We can all recall a time when we, or someone close to us, procrastinated. On the whole, it does not matter whether we procrastinate. Except. We may miss out on a career or life opportunity. But what happens when we procrastinate? Procrastination may be a consequence of worrying about worst possible outcomes, fearing we are not up to the task, not being interested enough in the task, or not being able to decide between several alternatives. Under those circumstances, it is very hard to find the time and energy to pursue the task. Under those same circumstances, we may find ourselves easily distracted by email, twitter, facebook, computer games and the like. We may externalise our frustrations onto other people or things that are then seen to block progress. At the end of the day, we don't know whether we would have succeeded, but we have lots of good reasons why we failed (and none of them are 'us'). But why do that to ourselves? We actually have nothing to lose by trying and we might even delightfully surprise ourselves.

Interestingly, procrastination is just another learned habit. Just like the automatic pilot we go into when we hop in the car to drive home from work. Perhaps we can take that automatic pilot and tweak it so that we form a new habit. One that involves proactive pursuit of our passions.

Proactively Set Career Goals: You can set a career goal that you are passionate about, something that you would enjoy filling your day with. If you were to visualise yourself 'there' in five years time, would it look, feel and sound good to you? If not, you might like to tweak that goal until it looks, feels and sounds fantastic. You can even keep tweaking it until it looks, feels and sounds amazingly better than fantastic.

Pursue What's Needed: You can then compare what things will be like when you have reached the career goal with what things are currently like for you. In making your comparisons, it may be useful to consider what knowledge, skills and abilities you would need to develop. You may also like to consider who could coach you.

Link Passions To Existing Routine: The easiest way to change the procrastination habit into a proactive pursuit of your passions is to link needed actions to existing routines (also known as habit stacking). Whatever it is, you may like to set aside five minutes a day to practice that skill, acquire that knowledge or develop that new ability. By linking activities to an existing routine, you will always remember to spend those few minutes a day on developing them. Within a matter of weeks, you will have an established routine that will put you on your path to success.

Before you know it, you will have reached your career goal. And, perhaps sooner than you think. So, what are you doing to proactively, pursue your passions today?

QUICK TIP

Kindles are becoming more and more useful. You can download a vast range of fiction and non-fiction. Many of these books are cheaper than the print version. Others are free.

Now there is no excuse for being bored when waiting in queues. Just download a selection of interesting e-books and you can feed your brain instead.

FOOD FOR THOUGHT

To be happy with our personal and professional lives, we need to be true to our own life purpose, our source of passion, our core values and what we consider important.

If we find that there are discrepancies between what we value, what we are passionate about, and how we spend our time, we may find ourselves feeling frustrated, bored, stressed or dissatisfied with our personal or professional lives.

So, why not start the year by taking stock of your passions, life purpose, your values and what's truly important to you. And, if you find you are far removed from them, be sure to put yourself on a path to return. So, what are you doing to be true to you today?
